

SMILE AT HIS FIANCEE AT PARTING COSTS HIM HIS LIFE UNDER TRAIN

Looks Backward at Her, Steps
Before Train and She Sees Him Killed.

The turn of his head as he looked back to smile in parting from his fiancée last evening at the Erie Railroad crossing at Garfield, N. J., cost young Charles Deval his life. As he stood to look back at her an eastbound freight train passed slowly, and it was with his head still turned in her direction that he started to cross the tracks.

Deval lived with his parents at No. 25 Midland avenue, Garfield. His fiancée, Miss Mary Martin of Holly, Pa., was visiting his home. He was a clerk at a mill in Garfield and at the usual hour of his home-coming Miss Martin went from his home to the Erie station to meet him. They stood for a few minutes, talking affectionately; then she told she had a little shopping to do and by the time he had returned home and prepared for dinner she would be there. He wanted to accompany her, but she said that would make him late for dinner. Together they watched the long freight train as it slowly passed in front of them. As the caboose in the rear came in sight she left him. She had been about twenty feet when she looked back. He had turned to smile at her. She saw him walk directly in front of the train and behold him thrown in the air for fully fifty feet. Screaming in her horror, she was the first to reach his side. She lifted his head to her lap, but at sight of the certainty of death marked on his face she was unconscious over him.

On being revived the hysterical girl was taken in an auto to the slain Deval's home. She was in a grave condition from shock last night, as were the parents.

It is impossible to wear a snug, well-fitting gown over a loose, ill-fitting petticoat. That's the reason that the with its invariable elastic waistband at the back and side, opening at the front closed with flat glove clasps, is daily becoming more and more popular with thousands of women who have discarded the old-fashioned, ill-fitting drawing petticoat, with its puffers and wrinkles.

Eppo Petticoats are made in the best and newest designs and colors and in every petticoat material—cottons, messalines, taffetas and all-silk jerseys.
